Domestic flight alternatives not only require safe areas, but also that they are accessible. Due to many factors, freedom of movement within Syria is severely restricted. This also applies to certain groups of people within the areas controlled by the Assad regime due to certain restrictions. For example, parts of the population of formerly opposition-controlled territories may not enter or leave them – or only under certain circumstances.

Detention of deportees before 2011

In 2008, Germany and the Assad regime concluded a readmission agreement in order to deport Syrians who are obliged to leave the country more effectively. The political background was, among other things, extensive intelligence cooperation between Germany and Syria to combat terrorism and flight.

In the years that followed, cases occurred repeatedly until 2011 in which Syrians deported from Germany were arrested in Syria and partly tortured (cf. Chapter 1 under "Torture before 2011").

Sources on arbitrary detention and disappeared persons

- Management Report of the German Federal Foreign Office (11/2018)

According to the situation report, "countless cases" of arbitrary arrest, detention without trial, and enforced disappearances have been documented since the beginning of the uprising in March 2011. (p.8). Arbitrary arrests were made by police, secret services and state-organised militias. "In a few cases, after some time, the arrested persons are transferred by the secret services to a regular prison and the judiciary. From this point, family members and lawyers usually have access to the persons concerned," he reports. In "many other cases", however, the persons "disappeared". Since March 2011, in a number of documented cases, the security services involved have only handed over the body of the arrested person to the relatives. (p.9)

Expulsion, expropriation and deprivation of rights of refugees

In particular, the Russian government, the protector of the Assad regime, staging its role as a peace-making force, argues that refugees could return to Syria, provided that Europe supports Syria in reconstruction.

However, the Assad regime, through a series of measures, makes it more difficult or impossible for internally displaced persons and Syrians who have fled abroad to return to their hometowns or homes.

Tailor-made regulations ensure that people who fled the Assad regime to other parts of the country or abroad have massive difficulties in asserting their property rights or returning to their homes. In some places—such as Qaboun and Daraya—the regime is destroying homes of displaced persons to make room for real estate projects and is denying access to former residents.

This type of "reconstruction" allows the regime to punish or expel dissident milieus while rewarding regime-loyal actors. In addition to the high risk of becoming victims of persecution, arbitrary detention, torture, enforced disappearance and murder, returnees face the risk of being deprived of elementary rights such as the right to property and housing.

Forced displacement is in some cases also an effect of denied reconciliations: „During reconciliation negotiations, the government produced lists of ‘irreconcilables’ in some areas. In Northern Homs, the government gave local negotiators a list of around 1,000 people it deemed to be ‘irreconcilable’, effectively suggesting that they had a choice between forced displacement and prison without the opportunity to reconcile their affairs with the state.“

Spate of death notifications from 2018

Already in January 2018, but especially in May and June 2018, the Syrian government updated the civil registers with intelligence data, declaring hundreds of disappeared persons dead. As a result, families who had often been searching for their relatives for a long time without any news of their whereabouts suddenly received information that their abducted relatives were dead. Many were killed years ago, often relatively soon after their arrest. When death certificates were issued, they usually referred to natural causes of death such as "heart failure."

7- Torture, where perpetrators are enjoying full impunity!

Caesar photos

A central proof for the systematic torture in Syrian prisons are the so-called Caesar files, a collection of 55,000 photos documenting at least 6,700 corpses showing traces of torture, ill-treatment or starvation. The pictures were taken in 2014 by a deserted photographer of the Syrian military police in two military hospitals near Damascus and smuggled out of the country by him. Neither the German government nor the UN have any doubts about the authenticity of the photos.

Sexualized torture and rape as a weapon of war

The UN and numerous human rights organizations report systematic sexual torture of women, children and sometimes men. A report by the UN Commission of Inquiry into Sexual Violence in Syria in March 2018 suggests that the Assad regime uses rape as a weapon of war.

Proceedings in Germany against torturers of the Assad regime

In Germany as well as in other European countries, charges and investigations are pending against high-ranking officials of the Syrian regime. The basis for this is the principle of universal jurisdiction, which allows crimes against humanity and other serious crimes to be brought before national courts, even if committed by foreigners abroad. In Germany, arrest warrants have already been issued for torturers of the regime.

Details of proceedings for torture

Proceedings in Germany

- The Federal Public Prosecutor is responsible for criminal offences that can be punished on the basis of the principle of international law. The organisation "European Center for Constitutional and Human Rights" (ECCHR), in cooperation with the Syrian human rights lawyers Anwar al Buni and Mazen Darwish, has filed criminal charges with the Attorney General's Office against high-ranking officials of the Syrian repressive apparatus.

In the meantime, the Attorney General's Office has opened proceedings and issued arrest warrants. In June 2018, the Federal Supreme Court issued an international arrest warrant against Jamil Hassan. Hassan is head of the Syrian Air Force Secret Service and thus responsible for torture in thousands of cases.

<https://www.ecchr.eu/fall/deutsche-justiz-erlaesst-haftbefehl-gegen-syrischen-geheimdienstchef-jamil-hassan>

- In February 2019, the Federal Prosecutor's Office executed warrants for the arrest of two Syrian citizens residing in Germany who are accused of crimes against humanity or of involvement in crimes against humanity:

Proceedings in other EU States

- In Austria, too, high-ranking employees of Syrian secret services are under investigation.

<https://www.ecchr.eu/fall/der-weg-zu-gerechtigkeit-fuehrt-ueber-europa-zb-oesterreich>

- Criminal charges are pending in Sweden and other EU countries. The website justiceinfo.net (status 2/2019) provides an analytical overview of criminal complaints and proceedings in Europe related to Syria:

Use of chemical weapons

The United Nations Commission of Inquiry on Syria investigated 37 uses of poison gas up until January 2018—the UN attributes 32 of these poison gas cases to the Assad regime and no one has been identified in the remaining five cases. There is no doubt that the Assad regime has repeatedly used both chlorine gas and sarin.

Human Rights Watch and many other organizations have described the use of chemical weapons by the Assad regime as systematic. The use of chemical weapons has remained unpunished, with the exception of largely symbolic unilateral US military strikes. It must be feared that the Assad regime will continue to use chemical weapons.

8- Syrian refugees still need protection

Alleged voluntary return movements—especially from Lebanon—are often seen as signs of improvement to the situation in Syria and used as an argument for deportations. In fact, many refugees are forced to return from Lebanon. This is evidenced by several reports.
